Was Gerald Boyle Really Defending Jeff?

A preliminary hearing is the 'trial before the trial,' where the judge decides if there is enough evidence for the defendant to stand trial.

Jeff Dahmer's attorney, Gerald Boyle, said there would be a preliminary hearing at that everything would be done per the law. Have a listen:

Gerald Boyle then did the opposite. Here's Jeff Dahmer giving up his right to a preliminary hearing:

What did Jeff Dahmer waiving his right to a preliminary hearing mean?

It meant that Jeff Dahmer's attorney, Gerald Boyle, wouldn't have the opportunity cross-examine the curious confession that shows his client admitting guilt after merely being shown photos and responding with statements similar to, "Yeah, that looks like the guy I killed."

It also meant that Gerald Boyle wouldn't have been able to question the fact that the confession contained another man's Social Security number.

Had there been a preliminary hearing, Gerald Boyle would have been able to point out that Jeff Dahmer suffered from polymyositis, a serious autoimmune disease that left him struggling to get up out of a chair during his trial, and as such, he would have been incapable of committing these acts. Jeff Dahmer was even photographed in a wheelchair during the trial:

Why didn't Gerald Boyle, a defense attorney, care about all this?

The polymyositis is why Jeff Dahmer held his arms the way he did. Sadly, John Backderf, who went to high school with Jeff, has been mocking Jeff's condition:

If there had been a preliminary hearing and proper cross-examination, it's possible a judge would not have accepted the confession with another man's Social Security number as sufficient evidence. If so, the charges would have probably been dropped.

Was Gerald Boyle actually defending Jeff Dahmer?

I feel so sad for Jeff. In a real case, the preliminary hearing would have identified that Jeff was p incapable due to his illness, never mind the faulty confession. It was done the way it was for a r and they relied on people's lack of knowledge of the law to pull this off. In reality, the guy was pictured in a wheelchair and now we know why.
