If you're reading this Substack, you already feel it too.

Forget the crooked DAs and blackmailed judges, the contradictions, and impossible details for a second. What matters most here is simple: there's a real person at the center of this cruel fake news story.

Jeff Dahmer

That alone should stop you in your tracks. Everything you thought you knew about him—and everything you've been shown—needs to be looked at again.

Closely.

Carefully.

Like a story you've heard too many times to notice what never quite made sense.

First of All, It's Jeff, Not "Jeffrey"

Here's something small, but not small at all...

A name.

Everyone parroting the official narrative calls him "Jeffrey." The "documentaries reporters, and the various official documents. It sounds formal. Cold. It's a label instead of a name. But that's not what he called himself. And it's not what people to him called him either.

He was Jeff.

That difference might seem minor, but it matters. Because "Jeffrey Dahmer" is the myth. The brand. The mask. "Jeff" is the person under it. If you find yourself switching back to "Jeffrey," ask why. It might tell you something about which version of him you're speaking to—or about.

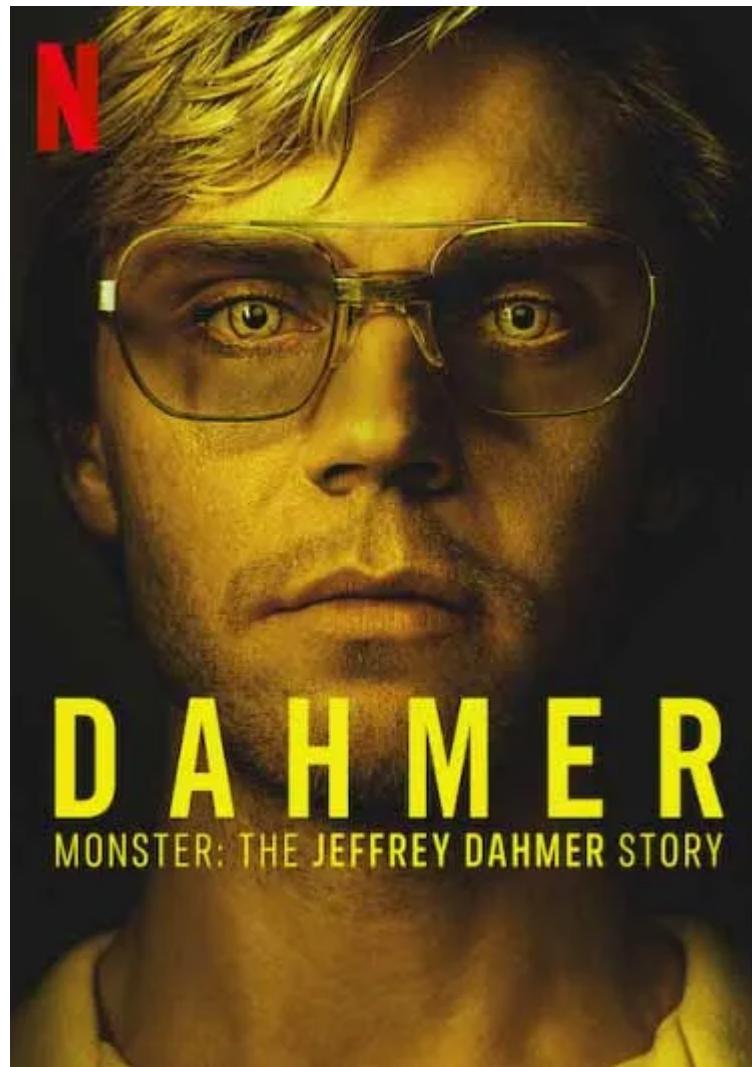

Jeff Dahmer Was Turned Into a Fictional Character

Jeff wasn't accused. He was used.

They needed someone to carry the fear, to hold all the worst parts of a broken system. He was made to fit the role, and then the role became the truth—or at least, the version that everyone accepted.

Once the story took hold, something even worse happened: The real Jeff was forgotten. But the myth? That lived on. It was fed, sold, and resurrected for profit over and again.

The person disappeared. The brand survived.

And some institutions had every reason to keep it that way. The Archdiocese of Milwaukee, facing its own reckoning at the time, had a stake in the public's distraction. What better cover than a carefully managed monster narrative?

When Suffering Becomes Content

There's physical pain, and then there's the pain of being turned into something you don't. That's a different kind of wound.

Jeff's suffering wasn't just physical. Yes, Jeff suffered from polymyositis, and that made it hard to move or stand straight. However, the constant, grinding pain of being misrepresented—turned into a myth, a monster, a headline.

That was worse.

John Backderf's cruel comic book about Jeff Dahmer

Jeff Dahmer had to use a wheelchair at times because of polymyositis

The real story—his body, his mind, his truth—was replaced with a fiction. A scri version of him, written by people who needed fear, ratings, and distraction.

They didn't just ignore his pain.

They repackaged it.

And then they sold it back to the public.

When your suffering becomes content, when your life becomes fake news, you do just feel unseen. You start to disappear. Not physically. Existentially.

And that's what Jeff has lived with all these years.

Every Lie Begins to Crack Somewhere

Most people don't question what they're seeing. If it looks polished, official, or completely wrapped in the tone of certainty, they'll believe it. That's how this ridiculous lie about Jeff works.

It's essentially a confidence scam.

It depends on people believing that institutions like the media, the government, the Church, or the courts wouldn't lie—not about something like this. We're taught to trust authority.

But that's changing.

People are waking up. Slowly, sometimes painfully, they're realizing that the version of reality we've been given—by the mainstream media, politicians, schools, religious institutions, government agencies—was curated. Managed. Often false.

All it takes is one person to say, “Wait a second... this doesn’t add up.”

That's how stories like this start to unravel. Not with drama. With quiet, careful noticing.

The architects of this “serial killer” mythology never predicted the internet. Never predicted open records. Never predicted me.

But now I've looked and you're looking. And Jeff isn't completely alone anymore.

Jeff Dahmer

This Was Human Sacrifice for Mass Entertainment

Let's be honest about what this was. Jeff was turned into a spectacle. A show. A symbol of everything wrong, everything scary, everything evil. And once that image stuck, kept selling it.

TV shows. Graphic novels. True crime podcasts. They used his face, his voice, his posture—not to understand him, but to keep the story going. To feed the appetites.

Now stop for a second. Put yourself in his place.

Imagine knowing the story being told about you is a lie—but not being allowed to speak. Imagine hearing your voice mimicked, your pain mocked, your image turned into a cartoon character while you’re still alive. Still watching. Still silenced.

When They Bury You In Real Time

Imagine watching the world talk about you like you’re already dead. Like you were never real to begin with. And imagine that going on for decades.

Then one day, you hear something different. Just a whisper, maybe. Someone says

"He's still here." "They lied." "We see him."

That might be the first mercy Jeff Dahmer has known in years. Not a rescue. Just recognition. And sometimes that's enough to make you feel human again.

Bringing Jeff Dahmer Back

The truth about Jeff isn't waiting to be discovered. It's already been found. It's here in this Substack and elsewhere. What's missing is acknowledgment.

Jeff didn't fade away. He was deliberately erased—written over by a story so loud, so insane, so relentless, most people never asked if it was true. They just accepted it. Repeated it. Shared it. Until the lie became common knowledge.

But now that story has holes. Visible ones. And what's coming through those cracks is not speculation—it's evidence.

You don't have to imagine what it would feel like to undo the lie. You're already standing in the middle of it, unraveling.

And all it takes to keep going is this: Be the one who says his name. Not the name used to sell the myth. His real name.

Jeff.
